An Eye Exam: Examining More than Just the Eyes The Eyes and your Overall Health

Perhaps you have excellent vision and no significant discomfort with your eyes, or maybe you've already had cataract surgery and are satisfied with the results. If this is the case, have you wondered if there is truly a need to continue to have your eyes examined? In part, the importance of an eye exam is due to silent ocular conditions that could begin to rob your sight without giving any frank initial signs. However, in this article we will discuss how having an eye exam can help preserve and protect your overall health.

We've all heard the expression: "The eyes are the window to the soul." Perhaps this isn't always true, but what we do know is that the eye is a window that allows us to examine our overall health.

Beginning with the eyelids and outer structures of the eye, the eye doctor can help detect serious health conditions. A persistent stye that doesn't seem to resolve with treatment, for instance, can be an indication of skin cancer. Another condition often detected before examining the outer structure of the eye is Thyroid Eye Disease, or Thyroid Orbitopathy. Protruding eyes that seem to bulge could be the beginning sign of hypothyroidism. In more extreme cases, an eye that protrudes on its own could be the indication of something more serious, like a tumor that is pushing behind the eye. The cornea, the transparent membrane that covers the front of the eye, could also give clues to detect health conditions such as high cholesterol. doctor can help detect serious health conditions.

One of the most impressive features of the eye, is that is the only place in the body where bare blood vessels and arteries can be seen. Through a dilated fundus exam, the eye doctor can detect cardiovascular conditions such as hypertension, diabetes and atherosclerosis. The ability to see and examine the fundus of the eye can also help detect signs of a variety of serious conditions such as leukemia, AIDS and diabetes.

At Elmquist Eye Group, our doctors don't only look for all these signs while examining the eyes, but they make sure to inform you of the findings and further investigate when needed. Having good and regular communication with your family physician also helps the doctors at Elmquist Eye Group ensure that you are properly taken care of.

In conclusion, whether your eyes appear to be healthy or not, examining them regularly is of vital importance. We care about more than just your eyes, your overall health is also our priority. Please contact our office if you feel that you would benefit from having an eye exam.
